Moises Levy

Perspective changes everything

Human condition is the main subject of his photography, Moises uses several resources to express his ideas in photography like perspective and scale and his images are too intimate. He believes being too close to his subject helps to create powerful images. His work is about people like a whole genre. He prefers to create anonymous subjects and for that he likes to work with backlight to create high contrast black and white images in a more graphic sense. He also likes to shot minimal and very clean images and for that he uses very low angles in places with almost no distractions like beaches and open spaces. Works with light and usually uses one camera (Fuji or Leica) and one lens (28 or 35 mm). He sees his work as timeless images of the human condition.

George Digalakis

His black and white world consists of surreal, beautiful and unearthly landscapes with the power to transport one to exotic, remote and never-before visited places, touched by a melancholic atmosphere, but without ever being melodramatic. George is a multi-award winning fine art photographer, based in Athens, Greece, with a passion for minimalistic images that convey the beauty of nature.

Michael Duckworth

The dance between darkness and light. Michael's style draws on his experience in art and cinematography. He finds his inspiration in film and music, but especially noir and sci-fi cinema. Michael hopes his shots tell a story as they might in a film. He likes to show the isolation of people and darkness of the city, but hopefully show its beauty too.

Alexandra Kaehn

Alexandra Kaehn is a Chicago based street photographer. Alexandra's interest for photography began very early in life and was influenced by her grandfathers passion for unique captures on film. The visual drama and artistry of her photographs are born of a keen eye for the many moods of random people and sceneries encountered on a daily basis throughout a frantic city. Alexandra believes that the most important quality of a photograph, as in all of art, is to evoke an emotional response and to focus on details that sometimes we might overlook.
