Dayana Montesano

Dayana Montesano was born in Rome in 1985. Since the very early stage of her artistic and educative development, she got into visual arts exploring devoid of prejudice both traditional techniques and digital approach. Obsessed by dreams and the unconscious, she explored these aspects in detail by means of psychoanalysis, in order to better understand herself and the world around her. Between 2014 and 2016 she was granted three scholarships at Scuola Romana di Fotografia (Rome School of Photography), where she attends a masterclass in "Personal and creative research" and a masterclass in the field of nude photography named "Naked photography".

Carne

"The 'Carne' series was born as a response to the censorship of Facebook. I think the taboos about the body are stupid because we all have bodies and we have sexuality and this should not be denied. Through the decomposition and recomposition of some photographs of faces, I have reconstructed genital organs. Through this system, the images respect the standards of social networks, but remain however referable to the sexual imagination."

Kristopher Andres

The goal of this shoot was just to have some fun and show how amazing this place is (Lake Agnes, Lake Louise, Alberta, Canada). How free we can be, as we dance with the bears in the shadows on the dark nights. To enjoying an epic sunrise and closing it off with a surreal shot of reflections and allowing us to look into the endless paths.

Nathalie Daoust

A graduate of the Cégep du Vieux in Montreal, Canadian photographer Nathalie Daoust, first caught public attention in 1999 with her surreal series New York Hotel Story. This sequence of photographs investigates the Carlton Arms Hotel's 54 uniquely decorated rooms. The resultant images establish Daoust as a photographer capable of cutting beneath the surface to expose her subject's hidden desires. Her images are portals, allowing the viewer to get a glimpse of a world divorced from reality, one that flickers from childlike wonderment to perversion.

Daoust is led by her need to understand the human impulse to construct experiences that allow us to live, at least for a moment, in a fictive world. From female dominatrices at an S&M Love Hotel in Japan in Tokyo Hotel Story, to one man's decision to discard his own identity in favor of another in Impersonating Mao, her work inhabits the liminal space between fiction and truth. Her most conceptually complex project to date, Korean Dreams, explores the meaning of fantasy itself. While in North Korea she experienced the manipulation of reality on a national scale; her photographs capture the layers of forced illusion perpetuated by the North Korean government.

Employing a variety of non-digital means to address her subjects, Daoust's methods play a crucial role in communicating content. Using specialized darkroom techniques, the process of creating the image itself contributes to her conceptual explorations. She is the recipient of numerous awards, and her work has been extensively showcased and published worldwide.

Korean Dreams

Photographer Nathalie Daoust's newest project, Korean Dreams, is a complex series that probes the unsettling vacuity of North Korea. Piercing its veil with her lens, these images reveal a country that seems to exist outside of time, as a carefully choreographed mirage. Daoust has spent much of her career exploring the chimeric world of fantasy: the hidden desires and urges that compel people to dream, to dress up, to move beyond the bounds of convention and to escape from reality. With Korean Dreams she is exploring this escapist impulse not as an individual choice, but as a way of life forced upon an entire nation.

Daoust deliberately obscures her photographs during the development stage, as the layers of film are peeled off, the images are stifled until the facts become 'lost' in the process and a sense of detachment from reality is revealed. This darkroom method mimics the way information is transferred in North Korea – the photographs, like the North Korean people, are both manipulated until the underlying truth is all but a blur. The resultant pictures speak to North Korean society, of missing information and concealed truth.

Nico Brons

Nico Brons' application to Fotoacademie Amsterdam in 2011 was not planned. He was 54 at the time. After working in IT for years he suddenly found himself at home facing a severe disease. A dark and troubling period until he realised that he needed to be in the driver's seat. Nico made an impulsive decision and registered for Fotoacademie Amsterdam.

In 2013 he was the first to graduate with images taken by Iphone. A daring project in the conservative world of photography. As a passionate photographer, Nico has specialised in portraits, interior photography, festival and concert registration and documentary work. His intuition leads him towards the photos. "Getting touched through the lens, I'm alert for the moment. It's all about picturing the emotion at the right time." Nico's work demonstrates excellent composition and his portraits are "close to the bone".

As the result of an accident, he can only see with one eye. He believes this is a benefit as he states, "I don't have to translate the 3D reality into a 2D picture. I don't see depth, so I already have a 2D view on the world." In a short time Nico has gained acknowledgement in Europe and overseas with his photography. His IphoneArt had been exhibited in New York, Los Angeles, Melbourne and Toronto.

"The endless applications of a smartphone give me all the freedom and opportunities to create images straight from my imagination. Sometimes dark, sometimes controversial, sometimes with a slight sense of humor. Images that blur boundaries between photography and art."

Stuart Moore

Photographer living in Walthamstow, North East London which is home to some of the most creative people he has ever met. Walthamstow is also home to the Marshes and Wetlands which are amazing oases of green among the metropolis (and great places to photograph). Born in London, Stuart grew up in East Anglia; it's probably where his love of big open skies comes from. He enjoyed working with film and B&W printing in his early years but now finds digital more flexible.
